The physical layer (in yellow) is not stable, or it can't be switched on. They think that there is no network connection, when the problem is actually with the physical layer or the switch. Since the physical layer is a physical layer which usually isn't replaced, the solution is of course to replace it. Special note: For many companies, supply of replacement network interfaces is difficult. The connector is the same, but since it is soldered to the motherboard, replacement is difficult and sometimes costs money. If you buy network interfaces and then do not have a physical layer stable or switched on, your computer will become very slow. To fix your physical layer problems, you have 2 solutions: You can try to buy a physical layer, which will probably be cheaper. You can buy a network adapter where the physical layer is external, and a USB-to-ethernet adapter and try to install the adapter as network interface.
